SYNOPSIS (Not for Publication)

"Fighting Jerry" Herrington, New York financial giant, in order to save his son, Rex, from a drunkard's grave, compels Helen, the beautiful daughter of William Brinsley, to marry his son.

Herrington, who knows that Brinsley has been speculating with funds not his own, uses that knowledge as a leverage to force Helen to marry Rex in order to save her father from disgrace.

Helen and Rex after a gorgeous church wedding sail for London where Rex continues his debauchery. Herrington's London manager takes love to Helen but she repulses him whereupon the manager cables Herrington that Helen is encouraging Rex to drink himself to death.

Herrington comes to London, upbraids Helen and finally by offering her a divorce, gains her consent to make a man out of Rex purely as a business proposition. Helen and Rex leave on a yachting trip and by strategy Helen finally succeeds in building up Rex's health.

The yacht is wrecked at sea and through a series of circumstances Helen, Rex and a brutish sailor are the only ones left on board. In a terrific three-cornered fight between Helen and Rex on one hand and the sailor on the other, the latter finally is killed.

Helen and Rex are picked up at sea and return to New York where Rex, having learned how his father forced Helen into marriage, compels his father to return the evidence against Helen's father to her and also takes steps to give Helen her freedom.

Helen, however, decides that perhaps after all Rex has the makings of a man in him and refuses to get a divorce. The story ends with a promise of a happy future married life for the two young folks who have been forced into marriage despite their own wishes.
